

Shēng

生 (shēng) — it could imply one of many things: to be born, to give birth, or to live. Most of these things are what a woman is obliged to do with the limited time they spend on this earth. To be given a life, and to be given the task of continuing the cycle. To grow and to give life to the next generation; to nurture them and to dedicate one's whole life to them. Thus this set of jewellery is thus dedicated to such women. They're flowers of a cactus: mesmerizing, full of life. They bloom in bright colours despite the very critical conditions of the desert, enduring the scarcity of water.

The piece consist of transparent, fluid-like flowers that represent the sweat and hardship of a woman, with pollens that looks like streams of tears, perhaps shed during the pain of growth. The bright red on the piece are the blood: the uterus, the womb, the umbilical cord that connects them to their next generation. Despite there being chains, that acts as the shackles within society which constantly attempts to bring them down, they're blooming ever so brightly. This is womanhood, this is Shēng: despite it be hardship, flowers will still bloom out of blood, sweat and tears nonetheless.
